

Project Give Back Reflections...

This year with Project Give Back, I have learned many different things about all kinds of charities. Like, what the charities do, what the charity is for, and more. I have also learned things that don't have to do with charities. I have learned that if you are kind to one person, they will not only be kind back to you, but you will have taught them to be nice to other people. Therefore, one act of kindness can do the whole world some good.

What I liked best about Project Give Back was everyone got to do a project on a charity. Doing the project helped me teach the class about what that charity does, and how important it is to help that charity. Also how important it is to support the charity and everything it does. I liked how Amy added some fun to the projects by letting us create a fun event to share with the class.

It is SO important to participate in Project Give Back. Project Give Back taught me how important it is to be kind to other people and to acquire knowledge about kindness and to share it with other people. Project Give Back also taught me how important it is to know that other people are just as important as I am and everyone has feelings just like I do.

I have changed as a person because I have realized that there are only charities because something terrible has happened. I have realized how important it is to donate to charities and to help other people. I have realized that there are not many people who give money to charities. That is why I must give to charities and we should all give to charities. Remember, if someone else changes for the better, we can all change in the same way.
